CBIA Responds to Proposition 45 Defeat: California's Affordability Crisis Demands Action

CBIA President and CEO Dan Dunmoyer calls for continued action on housing affordability and permitting reform following election results.

Sacramento, CA – Following the defeat of Proposition 45, California Building Industry Association (CBIA) President and CEO Dan Dunmoyer issued the following statement:

"The election may be over, but California's affordability crisis is not.

"Proposition 45's defeat is a disappointing setback for California families struggling with the high cost of housing. This was a historic opportunity to cut red tape and remove barriers to building the homes and essential infrastructure our state desperately needs.

"It is particularly troubling that the opposition spent over $32 million fighting reforms that would have created good-paying jobs and made housing more affordable for the very workers they claim to represent.

"We are grateful to our CBIA board members and the broad coalition led by CalChamber for their commitment to meaningful reform.

"We congratulate Governor-elect Xavier Becerra and California's newly elected leaders and look forward to working together to accelerate housing production and expand homeownership.

"California's housing crisis demands more than promises. The fight for a more affordable California continues."
